Resonance width and transport properties in the ultrathin-metal-wire Regime. The bandwidth of the resonance, the ratio between its width and the Fermi level, serves as a powerful probe of the scattering properties of electronic states. For a quantum wire, the resonance width is related to the lifetime of non-equilibrium carriers driven by bias voltage. In the ultrathin-metal-wire regime, the electrons of the metal show strong metallic or coherent scattering due to evanescent waves. The theory of the resonance width in this regime is developed in this paper. It is shown that, in addition to quantum interference between surface states and bulk states, the (2,1) interference caused by coherent scattering is the most important contribution to the resonance width, which leads to a varying electron lifetimes and a relatively large resonance width. In the conventional method for adjusting the paper height with respect to a register, an operator adjusts by himself the height of the paper with the aid of a paper height adjusting equipment which was manually operated by the operator when the operation was started, and such adjustment is repeated during operation until the desired paper height is obtained. However, the operator must inconveniently stop the operation and thereafter manually adjust the paper height with the paper height adjusting equipment, causing the operation to be complicated and involving the problem of involving a long time for adjusting the paper height.
